

SESSS

You have the School-wide Expectations Survey for Specific Settings, which we refer to as the SESSS. When teams come together for purposes of planning school-wide expectations, rather than it being a small group of five to seven to eight people making decisions on what to teach kids to be successful in each setting, we'd like to support you by offering you this tool to make sure that those decisions are data-informed and they represent feedback from everybody: the bus driver, the custodian, the cafeteria worker, paraprofessionals, administrators, and teachers, because we have unique perspectives from every adult in those different settings. Like thinking about bus behavior, who knows better about what to teach kids on the bus than the bus driver? On our website you'll be able to find examples of these completed reports if you'd like to see how these are compiled. We also have recently begun completing this measure in Qualtrics, which is another secure approach that you can use to collect these data to make this far more simple than doing entry by hand. But nonetheless, as you're considering the use of this measure, we applaud the people that have been testing it in different places such as in Rhode Island and in Tennessee and here in Kansas. We encourage you to consider this measure.
